13. Sample answer: A homeland is a place where people generally were brought up in, and where the culture of the place, be it through food, music, language or family, makes up a large part of their identity. So, when people move away from their homeland, it can feel as if a part of their identity is disappearing from them, as a result, they could feel saddened or lonely not having a group of people they share a common experience with, or feeling like they don't belong in somewhere new.
14. Sample answer: An asylum-seeker is an individual who has left their country for fear of persecution, their human rights being violated, or other natural disasters such as floods and famines. These people have not been granted refugee status yet. A refugee on the other hand has been recognized by criteria set by the UN, fearing persecution by their government due to race, religion, nationality, or political beliefs.
